The Legislature of 1893. The Legislature of 1883 has done what it thought well to do and adjourned within the constitutional limit of its life. It might remained longer it would probably have done no more; and so there is no great reason to find fault on this score.

It was a Legislature that will be remembered. It averaged well. It fairly represented the intelligence of the people who chose it It contained some strong men, some from coming often to the front. While there were some members who were untheir care, the legislation of the bred no scandals. A Senator of the United States was elected by the arrogant dictation of a political achine, with the offensive aid of corpora tion influences-and this will be remen bared against the party which permitted it in caucus and ratified it in the two houses. There are people in this State, and their tribe is increasing, who do not like this way of bestowing public office, which should ever be a public honor. And this dislike of machine rule is one of the influences which are undermining, surely and swiftly, the foundations of Bourbon domination in West Virginia.

The Legislature of 1883 will be remem bered most for what it refused to do. At the threshhold of its career it was con fronted with a deficiency in the Treasury The irreducible school fund had been re duced by $127,000 and the money diverted to the general uses of the State. Every effort of the Republicans to restore this money was stoutly and successfully resisted by the Democratic majority. The State had borrowed from a bank $140,000; no provision has been made for taking up the notes held by that institution. After much urging the majority did consent to appro priate once more nearly $12,000interest added now about $18,000-taken from the irreducible school fund, appro priated back in 1875, but never paid. There is no other guarantee now than there was evasive policy of its predecessor-the recreuse the tax rate five cents on the $100, making it now twenty-five cents. But the least informed member knew that this would not yield enough to meet the State's constitutional liabilities. But the Democratic party stood in no awe of the Consti tution of its own making-merely defied it That party has not heard the last of its peculiar handling of the finances.

The Democratic majority, though urged byRepublicans, refused to say a good word to Congress for the wool growers of West Virginia; refused to approve national aid to the common schools of the States; refused to endorse civil service reform; re fused to ask Congress to do something for Union soldiers who suffered in Confederate prisons; squarely and flatly refused to levy a tax to meet the State's obligations as the Constitution plainly provides. The record stands as the majority made it. The people know it, and they are in little danger of forgetting any part of it. The Democratic party has shown itself without the courage to face its wrong doing. PERSONAL.
